SMITHFIELD, Friday, April 12, 1844.

Our market to-day was moderately supplied with Beasts, but the fleet trade was tolerably active, at prices fully equal to those obtained on Monday. There was a fair effect from Scotland, and the Scots from Aberdeen and Dundee. In Sheep, the numbers of which were small, a steady business was transacted, and the quotations had an upward tendency. The Lamb trade was on the whole dull, at late rates. From the Isle of Wight, 60 Lambs came to hand. Calves moved off slowly at barely stationary figures, but to a more brisk demand. Milch Cows were held at from £16 to £18. 10s. each.

FRIDAY'S EXPRESS.

MARK LANE, Friday, April 12, 1844.

Our trade has been exceedingly dull, and can only arrive at, with accuracy, on Monday next. There was no alteration in price, and the only difference in the business was that the sales were rather declined in per quarter. The Seed trade is equally slow.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We decline to insert Mr. Lexton's letter: it seems to be little more than a case of one announced sanctimonious gentleman.

Our Linton correspondent will oblige us by refraining from crossing his letters. Paper and postage are cheap enough.

CAMBRIDGE, APRIL 13, 1844.

OUR twice-defeated neighbour, Mr. Richard Foster, has taken time by the forelock. No sooner did the news of Lord Abinger's death reach Downing, than all its ambitious and was fired with his olden desire to be a Parliament man, and quietly disposing of Chief Baronships, and Attorney-Generalships with his usual benevolence, and other small places of that kind, together, with intimated his intention of testing the traditional virtues of a third seat.

His address to the electors will not trespass greatly on our space, so we make him a present of his insertion in our columns:—

"To the Independent Electors of Cambridge.

"GENTLEMEN,—As there are rumours (probably well founded) of an early dissolution of Parliament, I beg to come forward, and to take the earliest opportunity of informing you (recollecting the cordial support with which you honoured me at the last election) of my intention, should I be elected vacancy take place, again to offer myself as a candidate for your suffrages. My political sentiments are well known to you, and I need only say that they remain unchanged.

"Your faithful and obedient servant,

"RICHD. FOSTER.

"Brooklands, April 9th, 1844.

So say we. Mr. Richard Foster's "political sentiments are well known." He is an Anti-Corn-Law Leaguer and a Political Dissenter. In these few words one sentence may be said. There is no mistaking about, for they comprise insurmountable obstacles to the march of his ambition. We care not what such sentiments he may entertain; being a friend to that mischievous and meddling spirit which would utterly ruin the staff and stay of England's greatness, he is not the man for an agricultural borough; and we will not so deeply insult the feelings of a people, she could choose one for her representative who would race to the ground the beloved Church of which none she is the honoured nurse. These are not the times to let private respectability outweigh great principles. And Mr. Foster possesses not these; and therefore we rejoice that if Conservatism is to be vanquished, or even assailed in the proud position of the borough, its opponent will possess two qualifications which will make the battle cling such peculiar disqualifications as Mr. Foster's. Mr. Foster is a banker, and our tradesmen are mainly dependent on agriculture—will they help to ruin their best customer, by supporting that Corn-Law Leaguer? Or can any man connected with the University, whether he be Member or a bencher, by any sort of consistency vote for a Political Dissenter? The agriculturists and the Church party in the University will scrutinize the claims of the man who pretends to their suffrages; and to their sense of right we must confidently rest for the protection from the scandal and disgrace which would be entailed on Cambridge by the election of a person holding Mr. Richard Foster's principles.

But when will Mr. Richard Foster have the opportunity of learning the extent of his hopes? This is the question which every one is asking just now. We pretend not to be in the secret of the Whig cabinet, but certainly it is considered not improbable that the lamented death of Lord Abinger may have the effect of producing a vacancy in the representation of this borough, by the elevation of our present estimable representative, Mr. Pemberton Leigh, to the distinguished position of the Solicitor-Generalship, to which he is so well entitled. Up to the time of Lord Abinger's "voluntary compulsion" a revenue far larger than any ministry, no matter how profligate it be named, Pollock, who succeeded Lord Abinger, has not been appointed.

And in the event of the necessity for an election in this borough, another contest—a contest between two "pendents" here on every occasion of more than ordinary interest—is considered a foolish tale to tell. But that should Mr. FitzRoy Kelly become the new Solicitor-General, "it is almost universally believed by both parties" that he will not be put to the present inconvenience of a dissolution for the sake of the "learned gentleman." This "universal belief" is confined to a party by no means distinguished for veracity, and to the ill-informed persons on this side, and the good enough for journals which have no means of testing the accuracy of the information sent to them.

In answer to this latter gratuitous assertion, it is positively assert there is not the slightest reason for supposing that the Solicitor-Generalship will be put under the necessity of selecting a new representative of their opinions, should a vacancy occur in the manner indicated above. Mr. FitzRoy Kelly is not the man to desert friends who are true to him. He will again, if need be, battle the battle of the Church Conservatives, and we have not the slightest doubt he will win it by a yet more decisive majority than that which marked his former victory. He has not come to big words from the other side, and have learned to utterly disregard them. The Liberal Dissenter's friends talk as they list, we defy the combined energies of Charists, Radicals, Liberal Dissenters, Socialists, and Chartists, and the long purse of which Messrs. Cobden and Bright have the management.

Possibly a word may be expected from us on the subject of a very gooseprofound attack on Mr. FitzRoy Kelly, which appeared in the Morning Herald on Tuesday; but as we presume no honourable man, of whatever political party, can read so shameless a production of the pens of the gentlemen of the Peel party's friends talk as they list, we defy the combined energies of Charists, Radicals, Liberal Dissenters, Socialists, and Chartists, and the long purse of which Messrs. Cobden and Bright have the management.

Possibly a word may be expected from us on the subject of a very gooseprofound attack on Mr. FitzRoy Kelly, which appeared in the Morning Herald on Tuesday; but as we presume no honourable man, of whatever political party, can read so shameless a production of the pens of the gentlemen of the Peel party as it will be in the recollection of the reader that the Whig Attorney-General in the House of Commons, following the rest on every point of attack on their opponents and only two political friends, was compelled to pronounce Mr. Kelly's speech on the charges which the Morning Chronicle would now revive against him. Rather let us appeal to our readers and to the gentlemen of the University at large, who are no pre-eminently distinguished, for their courtesy, even in the strongest language by which they are usually characterised, and in which they are unrivalled at the bar, whether the man or the paper has been guilty of the base conduct which the Government organ prompt information from its official authorities is remarkable, as it is of the first importance to secure the best lawyers which the bar can afford; questions on constitutional law, foreign law, and law, constitutional law—in fact on every branch of the law. And it is not unnecessary to remark that the Peel party, next to the Government serious embarrassment. We, therefore, anticipate the result of Mr. Kelly's appointment, which will not only gratify the feelings of a large majority of the profession, but will greatly benefit the public, but reward him for many years of intense professional exertion, and for the many sacrifices he has made on behalf of his party. We observe that some of the leading gentlemen have mentioned the name of two other gentlemen as probable objects of Sir Robert Peel's choice—Messrs. Sugden and Thesiger. We do not expect, however, that these gentlemen, we conceive that the idea of putting either of them in competition with Mr. Kelly is simply ridiculous. Mr. Thesiger is an elegant and fluent speaker, of considerable practice at the bar, but he is not a lawyer of the first class. Mr. Sugden is a man of sound sense and respectable legal attainments; but he is not a parliamentary lawyer. Both these gentlemen themselves would think of entering the lists as candidates for the office of Solicitor-General, in all events, in competition with such a man as Mr. Kelly."

The ROMISH Hierarchy in Ireland rejected a State provision before it was offered to them. Excited by the most unscrupulous agitation, they refused to accept the stipends out of the public purse, they met together with the view of repudiating the bounty, and determined to support their determination not to accept any provision the State might offer.

Perhaps the following extract from the Times ought to have waited for some tangible evidence that the insult of rejection was intended by the Irish people before it was to be added to the list of Ireland's wrongs, before they came out with their remonstrance. But we have quoted many, however, to show that no proof that their feelings on the subject are strong; and as it is quite out of the question to suppose that any one of the most violent hurry to reprobate the offer of money, one naturally feels disposed to suppose that some which have induced the Romish Bishops thus to act. For the lack of better, we are compelled to put up with that offered by the Dublin Evening Mail, who addresses the Irish Roman Catholics in the character of a Popish Priest.

This gentleman lays it down that the Roman Catholic Bishops and Priests of Ireland have "the highest entitlement" "from the present system of moral compulsion, than" any ministry, no matter how profligate it be named, Pollock, who succeeded Lord Abinger, has not been appointed.

And in the event of the necessity for an election in this borough, another contest—a contest between two "pendents" here on every occasion of more than ordinary interest—is considered a foolish tale to tell. But that should Mr. FitzRoy Kelly become the new Solicitor-General, "it is almost universally believed by both parties" that he will not be put to the present inconvenience of a dissolution for the sake of the "learned gentleman."
