

690 Additions and Corrections.—Births and Marriages. [July,

life. The prominent feature of his character was an elevated and glowing sense of honour, which is the germ of all that is good or great in man. He possessed an exquisite sensibility of disposition, not that emasculated sensibility that can droop over a novel, but that manly sensibility, energetic as his character, which, electrified by distress, made him prompt to feel for it, and active to relieve it. Into every scene of human woe, or human want, which came within his observation, he largely entered. As a friend, to his friends he was invaluable; as a father to his children, the incomparable virtues of his afflicted widow can alone mitigate their irreparable loss; and, as a valuable member of the community, he will long be regretted by the parish of Mary-la-Bonne, of which he was one of the brightest as well as most useful ornaments. Without affectation, Mr. Bosanquet was sincerely religious and uniformly constant in his attendance on divine worship. Though cut off in the prime of life, and under circumstances peculiarly calculated to disturb his last moments, yet they were tranquil and composed. A serene mind enabled him, under the most excruciating sufferings, to meet with resignation their agony; whilst a life of virtue, sustaining him in the arms of death, taught him to look with hope to their final reward in the mercies of his God.

Ibid. h. Mr. James, of Serjeants' inn, Fleet-street, who unhappily cut his throat from ear to ear, was a gentleman of considerable property, and upwards of 50 years old. He had for some time shewn attention to a young milliner at the West end of the town, who had induced him to promise her marriage. Dressed in his wedding-cloaths he was about to meet his bride when a friend called and remonstrated with him, stating certain facts not favourable to the lady. This made the strongest impression on Mr. J.'s mind; and, after seeing his friend to his carriage, the intended bridegroom committed the rash act abovementioned. The coroner's inquest brought in a verdict of Lunacy.
