On Threshold of New Year

Jimmie Faces New Life

By RITA WINTERS

Sybil lies snoring in the leather chair.

The four-year-old Staffordshire terrier is truly unaware she is sleeping in a time bomb atmosphere.

It is a typical living room in a country home except an intricate phone system, scanner radio and mobile radio unit sit ready. A woman, neatly uniformed, is stationed at the equipment desk.

JIMMIE McVICKER, only child of Mr. and Mrs. James N. McVicker, is nearby in the hospital bed, set up in the middle of the living room.

This scene is the center for the Arrow Ambulance Service and the bright young man, rendered a quadriplegic from an automobile-horse accident July 31, 1971, is its capable director.

"I always wanted to work in a hospital or be an ambulance driver," says the 1967 Yorktown High School graduate. "It was my original goal to have a job where I could help people."

NOW, WITH his sophisticated Indiana Bell Telephone equipment fitted to his face, the tiny ear plug and minute voice tube put him in immediate contact with crises throughout East Central Indiana. The only other requirement is the three women, Mary Bush, Jeffry Ault, or his Mom, Maxine McVicker, to push the set of buttons which control his communication system.

Additionally, 12 trained drivers and attendants comprise the firm's staff and move in three ambulances to Jimmie's efficient direction.

Persons in emergency situations beckon his services and he never knows when the phone will ring.

"It's like waiting for an explosion," explains service aide Mary Bush, who has been working with Jimmie since October.

He recalls the fateful July, 1971 night indelibly.

"It's all so ironic. My friend Les Bertram and I had been to an ambulance driver's training school and we were on the way home when the accident occurred. In training, we had just discussed how to handle accident victims who were pinned in wreckage. The horse had landed on the roof of the car, collapsing the entire top, which pushed my neck backwards and crushed my vertebrae, causing paralysis from the neck down. Les, who was only cut and bruised, got out of the car and got in the back seat and held my head up, which later the doctors said kept more severe damage from occurring. We had just studied about how such aid could be given."

Further irony raced through his young mind. Three weeks before the accident in his job as a driver for the Muncie Ambulance Service he had taken a young woman to the Indiana University Medical Center who was fitted with "Clutchfield Tongs" an arrangement which is bolted into the patient's head in order to keep the neck in the proper position.

"MY GOD," he had thought in leaving the patient, "I hope that never happens to me."

But it did.

Jimmie has lived a lifetime in the past 2½ years. At first he rejected life. A nurse at the IU Medical Center talked firmly to him. He listened.

SIX MONTHS at the center readied him for three months at the Rehabilitation Institute of Chicago. His folks, faithful and dedicated, learned all the necessary procedures for muscle and tendon massage to keep his motionless body healthy. Many other care requirements were absorbed into everyday life after he came home in April, 1972.

The ambulance business was Jimmie's dream and since its opening June 18, 1973 its growth has had his attention. For five months, the dispatch base and office has functioned in the family living room, but now it is in the process of relocating at 1128 S. Madison St. It is more centrally located.

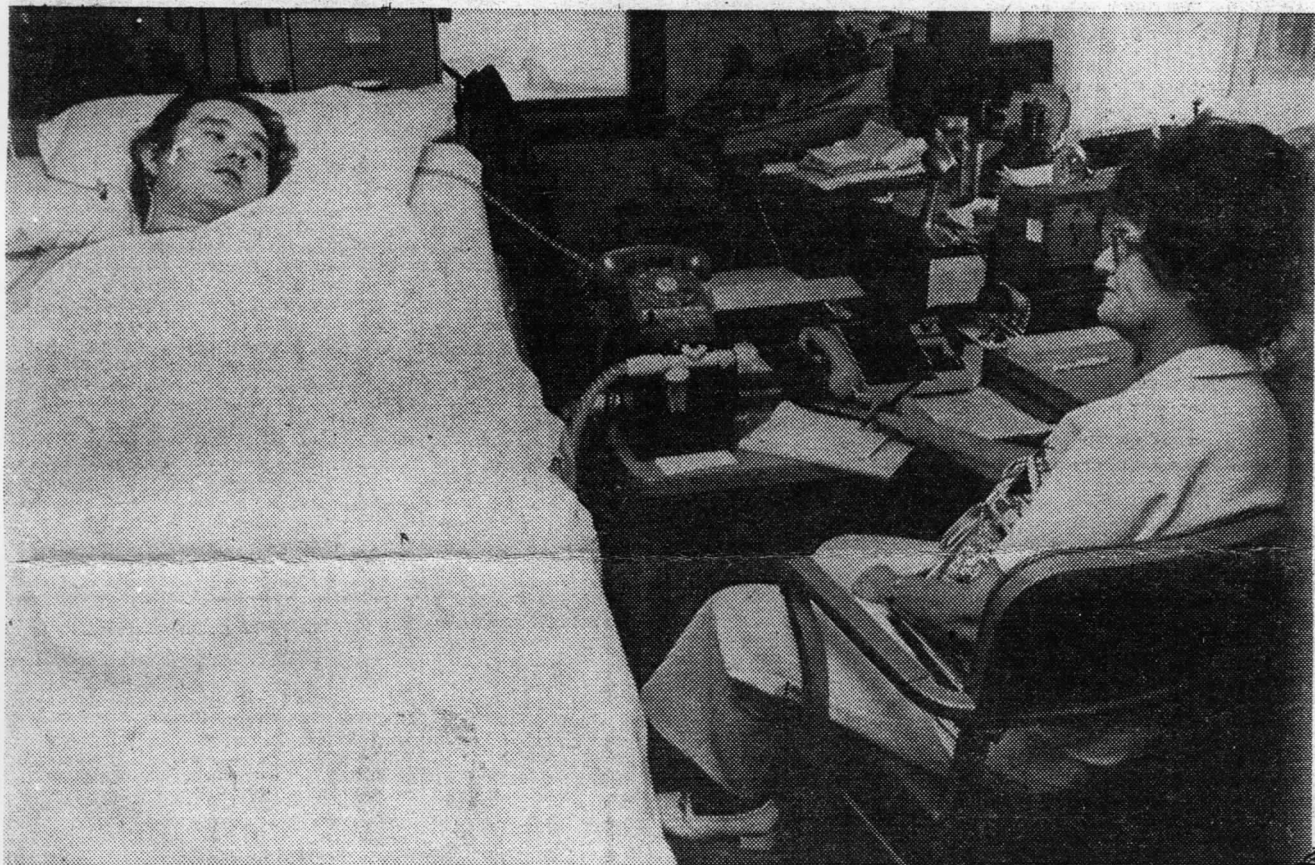

His own business experience began as a student when he worked for Bonnet Drugs, Yorktown. Later he was a Zayre's and Sears employe which he credits as valuable experience in learning about people.

A CLEAR CUT voice is backed up with an empathy for people's problems. An inquiry about a special wheel chair his firm rents brought Jimmie to support the information he was giving with "I'm a quadriplegic and the chair I use has the kind of features you are asking about," he said to the man on the phone.

But it is tempered with his positive approach about what his life ahead means. "I don't want pity. The doctors told me their statistics say I won't ever walk again. But they also say they don't have statistics that say I could not walk again."

Jimmie's hospital bed confinement is only temporary. The lift net used to place him in and out of his chair created a skin lesion which has been difficult to heal. Bed rest has lingered over nine weeks and it cancelled his Christmas shopping trips. "I intend to get out eventually and do it," he says, "and we may be wrapping and unwrapping gifts Valentine's Day."

Giving Direction

Keen in perception, quadraplegic Jimmie McVicker gives verbal direction to his assistant Mary Bush in the office of the young man's ambulance service. An extensive communications system includes the equipment which he wears taped to his ear and face. It allows direct communication with his 12 drivers. The young man's parents and his aunt are officers of the corporation board formed last June when the service began. (Star Photo by Ron Coppock)

Doctor at Ball State Health Center Knows Her Career Choice Was Right

9-7-86
By MARJORIE C. YOKAITIS
For The Muncie Star

“I think I was born to be a doctor,” said Marjorie Galliher, a medical doctor at the health center at Ball State University.

“And though some of the time I practiced was in an era when medicine was considered a ‘man’s field,’ I never had a bit of trouble. It’s always been a pleasure,” she said.

Galliher graduated from Ball State in 1943 and from Indiana University School of Medicine in 1946.

“We were the first ‘war class’ or accelerated class. We went summer and winter to get in the 4 years. We started out with 130 pupils and ended up with 82. I think a lot of fellows were more interested in the war than they were in medicine. And they ended up at — Camp Grant! We started out with the largest group of women up to that time — 15 in all. But out of that 15, only four graduated. Things happen, you know.”

And, she has seen many things happen in her career — especially changes.

“In my private practice, I had the entire family to treat,” she said. “The first one was usually the child or the woman. And then I would end up treating the entire family. We had many humorous things happen during that time.”

There were also interesting times at Ball State in those early days.

“A particularly interesting time was when the Arabs were on campus. Their philosophy of life and way of life is so different from ours. The Arab women would come into my office, usually pregnant. And the fathers would come along. They thought of me as the lowest person on the totem pole. The mothers would go down the hall, then the fathers and I would be last. Then we’d go into the examining room and the fathers would oversee everything I’d do. He scarcely let her speak for herself. During the examination he would look right over my shoulder. Then if they didn’t agree with what I prescribed, they would stand and hem and haw and do everything until they absolutely had their own way. It was a new experience for me.”

She has now retired from private practice and enjoys her work at the center.

“Everyone and everybody connected with it [the center] have been so nice. The advantages of working here are many. All the office work is done for you. There are lots of good nurses to help you. And also, the wear and tear of keeping up your own building is gone. We have many people who have been here for years. They are very knowledgeable, very helpful — lovely people to work with. And we have a wonderful director, Dr. [Michael] Seidle.

“My work here is general practice. It’s about the same as having your own office. We see the students and employees. We also see guests of the university who have been injured on campus. We do lots of physicals, too. We don’t do obstetrics but we do everything else,” she said.

And, she enjoys being around the young people. “They are most rewarding. The students are so nice, fun to be around and bright. If I have any questions — I ask them! I think young people of today are more health conscious. They are doing more training and conditioning. I think their health habits are better. They are wonderful people.”

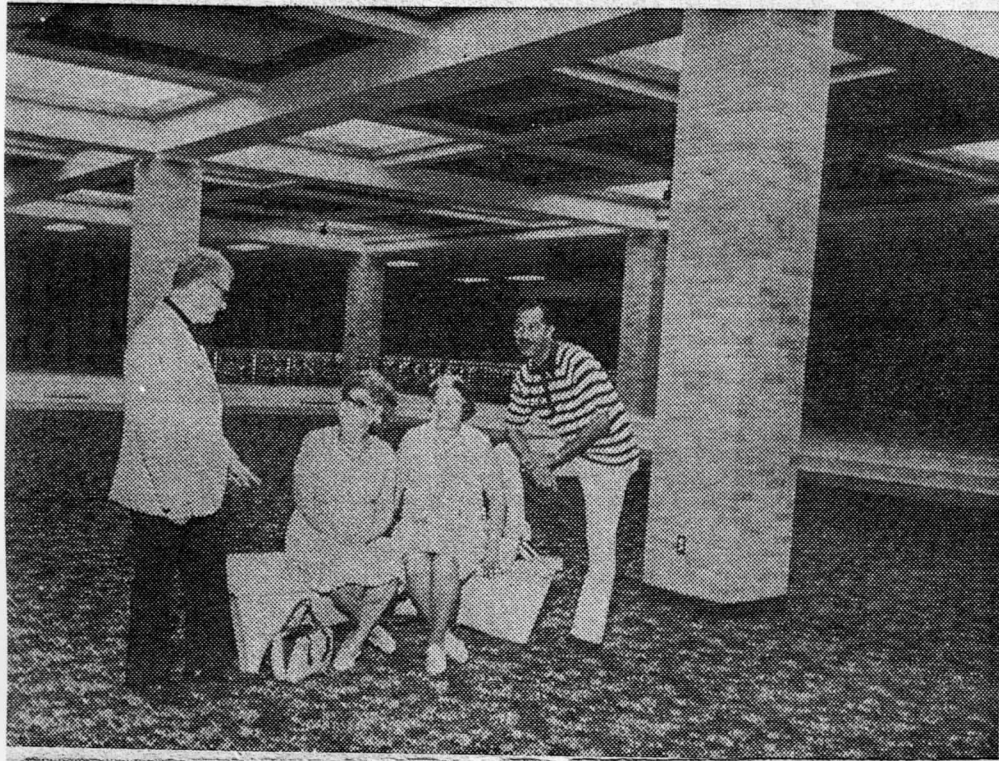

There are many opportunities for women in medicine today, she noted. “I can’t think of any field in which a woman couldn’t practice. And it’s certainly compatible with marriage and children. However, a lot of prospective doctors are thinking twice before entering the field. There are so many federal restrictions in medicine in regard to the treatment of the patient. Because of these restrictions, medicine has lost a lot of things that make it worthwhile. During my practice I never had those restrictions and so I had a much nicer time of it. And then too, there is a malpractice insurance which is so expensive — particularly in the specialties. A doctor can scarcely afford to buy it.”

Her greatest satisfaction in her career as a doctor, she said, is providing “service to others.”
